FUND MANAGERS COMMENT

In February, European equity markets continued their upward trend for the eighth month in a row. They clearly outperformed their US peers, who are facing growing concerns about the risks of disruption caused by the boom in generative artificial intelligence. Although the positive momentum continues in Europe, it is accompanied by a marked sector rotation, with defensive sectors and consumer staples outperforming, at the expense of segments perceived as the future losers of the generative AI revolution. At the end of the month, the market barely reacted to the US Supreme Court's decision to overturn the reciprocal tariffs (IEEPA) and the US administration's response, which imposed a 10% (later increased to 15%) tariff on all imports from the countries concerned for a period of 150 days. In retaliation, the EU suspended the ratification process for the trade agreement between itself and the United States. In this climate, the gold price rose further. Brent crude oil reached its highest level in six months following the announcement of the conflict between the US and Iran in the early hours of Saturday 28th. European long-term rates fell, proving more sensitive than equities to underlying geopolitical risk. European composite credit spreads widened slightly, as investors worried about new signs of fragility in the private credit market. Conversely, the euro/dollar exchange rate remained stable over the period. At the macroeconomic level, the Eurozone composite PMI came in at 51.9, exceeding expectations. The improvement was widespread, driven by both the services sector and the manufacturing sector (particularly in Germany). This month saw a particularly high number of earnings releases, and the IBES Datastream consensus revised its EPS forecasts for the Stoxx 600 for 2026 and 2027 down slightly (-0,3%). Earnings growth expectations now stand at 10,4% for 2026 and 11,9% for 2027, reflecting a still robust earnings profile. Against this backdrop, the equity market's performance in February was once again driven primarily by a rerating effect rather than an upward revision of the microeconomic outlook. At the sector level, the performance hierarchy revealed a marked advantage for sectors with limited exposure to the risk of AI-induced disruption: telecoms, retail, real estate, basic materials, energy, chemicals, construction, as well as food, beverages and utilities. By contrast, sectors perceived as vulnerable to technological change (software, media) suffered. The banking and healthcare sectors were also shunned. Lazard Sovereignty Europe performed very well in February, benefiting from a favourable asset allocation effect due to the absence of banks in the portfolio and underweighting in financial services. There were also strong contributions from industrial stocks such as Kongsberg, ArcelorMittal, Schneider Electric, Safran and Vaisala. The telecoms sector (Orange, Elisa, Deutsche Telekom) and Nokia also performed very well. Fears of AI-related disruption had a limited impact on the portfolio (Sopra Steria, Dassault Systèmes).
