Management commentary

The ECB gave no more indications than at its previous meeting, merely announcing its revised growth forecasts. At +1.7% in 2020, its new inflation forecasts is closer to its target but a little disappointing nonetheless. The Federal Reserve delivered its 25bps interest-rate rise but the market still finds it hard to believe that it could implement the three interest-rate hikes forecast in the 'dots' projections for 2018. Lastly, the adoption of the US tax reform probably explains the around 10bps rise in yields just before the Christmas lull. Whether in Europe or the United States, the two political spheres, although taking very different paths, appear to be in a position to realize the reformist and pro-growth ambitions.

European growth continues to surprise by its strong momentum and synchronization throughout the Eurozone. A transmission of this growth to wages and therefore to inflation is becoming increasingly likely, as can be seen in the slow but steady rise in inflation expectation that continued throughout December. Nonetheless, normalization of inflation expectations is still half way: the difference between short-term and long-term expectations is still excessively low, showing the level of skepticism as to the capacity of our economies to generate inflation over the longer term. A major focal point of our investment strategy in 2018 will to position so as to capture any normalization is this time spread.

Rumors of general elections in Italy on March 4 pushed the 10-year spread wider by around 10bps. In contrast, the Catalan elections, won by the independence candidates in terms of number of seats although they did not achieve a majority in terms of votes, had no impact on Spain's spreads. We remain on the whole cautious with regard to our exposure to peripheral countries but we have slightly increased the risk budget allocated to Italy, partly in exchange for reducing the position on Spain.

The visibility is not so good in the United Kingdom given the uncertainties surrounding the Brexit negotiations. Economic growth could prove disappointing but the key to the trend in inflation expectations with Sterling exchange rate trends. The spectacular leap in inflation in 2017 from 2.5% to nearly 4%, linked entirely to post-Brexit depreciation of Sterling has apparently failed to convince investors to bet on inflation indexed bonds. Inflation expectations have in fact declined over the year, highlighting the market's lack of enthusiasm concerning the growth outlook for the United Kingdom. We are maintaining our position on a fall in UK inflation expectations.

The portfolio outperformed its benchmark over the month, boosted by the rise in inflation expectations and its cautious position on interest rates.
